WORKING TOGETHER to save the world's parrots

People love parrots for their intelligence, beauty and diversity. Sadly, these highly social birds are among the most endangered on Earth, with nearly one in three species threatened in the wild due mainly to trapping for the wildlife trade and habitat destruction.

Millions of companion birds face different challenges - caregivers often do not have the knowledge and resources to meet their bird's health and behavioural needs.

The World Parrot Trust (WPT) is a non-profit organisation dedicated to saving parrots by leading science-based efforts to eliminate threats, protect habitats and support in-country conservation and welfare programs. We forge partnerships with local individuals, organizations, communities and governments by providing technical, logistical and funding support. Since its beginnings in 1989, the WPT has helped save over 80 species of parrot in 45 countries.

Our sincerest thanks to you.

As another busy year draws to a close, all of us at the Trust are keen to look back at and share our recent work with you. We've put together this review to guide you through the key areas of our conservation and welfare focus.

Parrot conservation nearly always requires being creative to get work done — it's something we've learned over the years that has allowed us to be agile in our responses to urgent events and effective in the long-term.

As you will see, our work lies in five different areas, many closely linked and all equally important.

You are an integral part of this work and of our successes. Thank-you for continuing to show us that you share our love of parrots.

SAVING ENDANGERED SPECIES

SAVING ENDANGERED PARROTS BEGINS WITH UNDERSTANDING THEIR STATUS IN THE WILD.

Wild parrots are highly threatened, with nearly one-in-three species at serious risk of decline. WPT collaborates with front-line partners to study the ecology and status of endangered parrots by surveying their wild populations, interviewing local people, reviewing historical sightings, carrying out genetic studies and supporting range-wide population counts. These actions help identify serious dangers, which include trapping for the pet trade, persecution, disease, habitat loss and emerging threats such as climate change.

Once we recognise the issues, WPT works with partners to stop further declines and rebuild wild populations with several strategies, including supporting breeding-for-release programs, enabling nest protection work, stopping trade and working on reintroductions.

Seeking the long-term support of all levels of government, local communities and partner NGOs is vital to enduring and impactful conservation success.

Thick-billed Parrots (Rhynchopsitta pachyrhyncha), information that will guide new measures to protect these birds. Technology is also proving to be essential in understanding the habitat requirements of Kakapos (Strigops habroptilus) where WPT arm, New Zealand Parrot Trust, has provided GPS units to track these most unusual of parrots. Research into lovebird genetics has been identified as a priority for their conservation. The results will guide breeding-for-release programs in areas where these birds have been lost. WPT also supports projects around the world that are working to boost critically low parrot populations. A collaboration with the Puerto Rican Department of Natural Resources and the Río Abajo Puerto Rican Amazon Project is helping to significantly improve parrot numbers through a breeding-for-release program, with over 100 chicks having hatched between the captive and wild populations this year alone. There are now over 200 Puerto Rican Amazons (Amazona vittata) flying free, a new milestone, in Río Abajo State Forest.

Elsewhere, ongoing work with Ara Manzanillo in Costa Rica and PRO-ALAS in Honduras to helping to boost Great Green Macaw (Ara ambiguus) and Scarlet Macaw (Ara macao) populations in protected areas.

PROTECTING WILD SPACES

PRESERVING VIABLE AREAS FOR WILD PARROTS IS CRITICAL TO THEIR LONG-TERM SURVIVAL.

Parrots are found in many types of habitat, including fragile dry forest, grassland, rainforest and high-altitude mountain ranges. Unfortunately, many of these areas have been destroyed through logging, agriculture and uncontrolled bushfires, all of which have seriously impacted the lives of both parrots and people. WPT helps in-country projects slow the loss of critical habitat through establishing protected areas, growing and planting native trees, and supporting fire mitigation work.

Efforts may initially focus on surveying how much habitat is remaining, assessing its ability to sustain parrot populations and identifying the factors that are negatively impacting it. In addition, determining how wild parrots use habitat for foraging and nesting is a key element for understanding how to protect the most critical areas. Finally, habitat protection and restoration efforts focus on establishing native flora, removing invasive plant species, creating protected reserves, and teaching local communities sustainable use and how to prevent or reduce damaging fires.

HIGHLIGHTS

Parrot habitat is regularly destroyed by logging, fire and human intrusion. WPT, with its partners, helps restore some of these important wild spaces.

At-risk ecosystems are found in the Caribbean and South America. Much of Bonaire's dry forest has been eliminated by logging and grazing by non-native animals, greatly affecting the land and its wildlife.

The Yellow-shouldered Amazon (Amazona barbadensis) has been particularly hard-hit by these activities, as well as from illegal poaching. WPT is supporting Echo, a local partner working to conserve these parrots and their habitat on Bonaire. Thus far they have protected more than 33 hectares by creating herbivore exclusion zones, planted over 13,000 native trees and shrubs, removed invasive plants and are encouraging awareness of sustainable land use in local communities.

In Bolivia, 2019's destructive blazes burned nearly 6 million hectares (14.8 million acres), including areas where critically endangered macaws are found.

WPT recently provided technical and logistical support for fire mitigation training in partnership with Fundación CLB, a fire specialist and 70 local participants from three Protected Areas in Bolivia. Trainees were taught how to construct fire lines and use backburning to contain blazes, as well as how to use specialised equipment. Training will continue to help empower local communities to prevent and manage fires to protect themselves and wildlife.

Because of your generosity, hundreds of thousands of hectares are being protected.

FIGHTING WILDLIFE TRADE

ILLEGAL TRAPPING CAUSES WILD POPULATION DECLINES AND WELFARE ISSUES FOR INDIVIDUAL BIRDS.

To address the wild bird trade's complex challenges, WPT has a multi-pronged strategy that includes providing awareness about the harms of trapping and collaborating to research and investigate what drives trade. The data informs actions with community-based projects to protect wildlife from poachers, and collaborations with local NGOs and law enforcement to disrupt trafficking networks.

WPT also partners with airlines and other corporations in strengthening their systems to prevent trafficking and encourages governments to use evidence-based policies to regulate both national and international trade. WPT has been quick to respond to the threat posed by online platforms that enable trade in wild parrots, and advocates for technology companies and governments to take action to prevent traffickers exploiting online environments.

WPT's FlyFree programme instructs enforcement agencies, rescue centres and other groups in the responsible care and management of parrots seized from illegal trade. WPT also provides emergency technical and logistical support to rescues, funds supplies and infrastructure, and trains first responders and animal care and veterinary staff. Where possible, and in the interests of conservation and welfare, parrots are rehabilitated and released back into the wild.

HIGHLIGHTS

People have long been fascinated by parrots' beauty and intelligence. Tragically, that appeal has led to them being threatened by the wildlife trade, which causes suffering to thousands of parrots each year.

WPT's work centres on research, promoting anti-trade education, disrupting trafficking networks and providing technical and veterinary help to in-country organisations working to rehabilitate and release parrots caught in trade.

WPT is actively carrying out anti-trade work in Africa, South America and Indonesia. With Lwiro Primate Rehabilitation Centre in Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), WPT took part in the first soft release of 39 Grey Parrots (Psittacus erithacus) into a national park there, and supported a second release of 63 more Greys rescued from traffickers. In Liberia WPT has helped Libassa Wildlife Sanctuary with ongoing parrot rescue and rehabilitation, most recently with 15 Timneh Parrots (Psittacus timneh) confiscated from traffickers. In Brazil, 500 Blue-fronted Amazons (Amazona aestiva) have been rehabilitated and released back to the wild in collaboration with Lins Ecological Farm, ASM Cambaquara and the Caatinga Parrots Project. Many of these birds are now starting to use nest boxes provided by the project teams.

WPT has also built partnerships with organisations such as the Global Initiative Against Transnational Organised Crime (GITOC) and the Alliance to Counter Crime Online (ACCO) to take steps in stopping online trade.

Your contributions are ensuring that more parrots are spared the devastating effects of trade.

IMPROVING WELFARE

FOR PARROTS TO THRIVE THEY NEED ADEQUATE CARE, SOCIALISING AND ENRICHMENT.

Millions of people keep parrots as companions. Unfortunately, some of these birds suffer because their caregivers have little information about their physical needs. Additionally, thousands of wild parrots endure physical harm at the hands of trappers and dealers.

Providing parrot-related education and awareness is a high priority for the World Parrot Trust. WPT publishes a collection of comprehensive resources, including care, behaviour and enrichment materials, to an audience of hundreds of thousands of caregivers, bird-keepers and rescue workers to help spread awareness for and improve individual parrot welfare. WPT reaches people through hands-on training, webinars, podcasts, social media, email and print resources that are published in multiple languages.

To help alleviate overcrowding in parrot rescues, WPT encourages adoption and education through reputable facilities. In emergency circumstances, WPT also develops and manages facilities such as the United Kingdom's Kiwa Centre, which is home to hundreds of rescued birds.

HIGHLIGHTS

WPT uses multiple approaches to advocate for improved care and enrichment for both wild and companion parrots.

These measures encompass community and national activities all the way up to worldwide education and support campaigns.

Direct support to rescues is also a priority. WPT's Kiwa Centre in the United Kingdom has provided long-term sanctuary and enrichment for nearly 150 macaws and parrots. Partner Belize Bird Rescue cares for hundreds of birds of various ages, species and health status each year. These patients suffer from poor care, injuries and the effects of trapping. Those that fully recover are released back to the wild.

WPT also provides ongoing training on how to safely manage confiscated birds, country-by-country, for rescue workers, rangers and government officials on the frontlines preventing trade.

Finally, in early 2022 WPT mobilised hundreds of supporters to provide emergency funding for food, medication and transport to safety for Ukrainians and their companion birds in the war-scarred country.

INSPIRING COMMUNITIES TO PROTECT WILDLIFE

ENGAGING WITH LOCAL COMMUNITIES TO SECURE LONG-TERM PROTECTION.

Illegal trapping, clearing for agriculture, persecution and other human activities threaten wild parrot populations.

Reaching out to local people where parrots live is the beginning of ensuring their protection. Communities are more likely to protect parrots if they learn more about their lives in the wild, the threats they face and how important they are to their ecosystems.

WPT supports partners that involve communities in learning about and caring for parrots and their habitat. In-country, non-governmental organisations put in place school programs and community events that teach about and celebrate parrots, and also work to create ecotourism and other sustainable, long-term ventures that benefit both people and parrots.

HIGHLIGHTS

People have important roles to play as stewards of Earth's natural resources. WPT has long partnered with local communities that have a common aim in conserving parrots through outreach and awareness.

Far left, top: A banner at a village gathering house on Bali island, Indonesia, cautions against hunting and trapping birds.

WPT recently teamed up with Arise News and WildAid Africa to produce a 10-minute film about the conservation and welfare plight of Grey Parrots (Psittacus erithacus) and the impacts of the wild bird trade in Nigeria. The film, which has been broadcast multiple times on national TV in Nigeria and other African countries, explores the threats that wild Greys are facing and what is being done to protect them.

WPT is also supporting other important work: in Mexico, rescue organisation TIVÚ A.C. is teaching local women's groups how to benefit from protecting parrots through crafting and other microindustries designed to bring extra income to families. PRO-ALAS in Honduras engages local people in parrot-themed special events and provides educational materials to school children, and ASM Cambaquara spreads awareness of the threats to parrots in Brazil. WPT-Indonesia's team, together with local organisations, is also seeing positive results raising awareness of the status of wild parrot populations and the illegality of harming birds in villages on Bali. Educational banners are placed in locations where shooting and trapping is known to take place. It is hoped that this initiative will be beneficial in other areas on Bali, as well as other islands in Indonesia.

More parrots and people are benefitting from programs that encourage sustainable initiatives, thanks to you.

Who would think conservation work around cute and charming African lovebirds could be full of potential threats? We came to a ranger's camp site in a remote location in Zambia, southern Africa, near a waterhole which attracted animals such as hippos, buffalos, and lovebirds.

When we arrived, the caretaker informed us that the area was also home to a pride of 15 lions. By this time, we were used to getting up at 3AM in the morning to start our work. This night, however, we didn't sleep. The rangers and caretakers did not allow us to set up our tents but instead use beds in the little hut they had constructed. We followed their advice and were woken up near midnight by loud lion roars.

Thanks to them we were surrounded by somewhat stable walls, did not end up as midnight snacks for the pack of lions so that we can be here to tell the story and most importantly continue the journey of saving Africa's lovebirds!

~ Sascha Dueker,
WPT Lovebird Conservation Coordinator

What I love the most about my work at WPT is that our hands-on approach, turns conservation possibilities into realities. On Norfolk Island, Tasman Parakeets were down to 30 or so birds in 2013. But now they number 400-500 birds thanks to nest protection from exotic predators and community engagement.

Nothing beats the excitement of holding a parakeet chick knowing that its chances of survival are much greater now than a decade ago!

"This awesome organization is doing a great job of helping to conserve parrots in the wild not only by fighting to disrupt the black market trade but by educating locals to cherish and protect their indigenous birds. They also support important research into parrot behavior and breeding and help return poached parrots to the wild. I am proud to be a longtime supporter of the World Parrot Trust."

Donors making a difference

Parrots in the wild are 'canaries in the coal-mine' of our natural world. We are losing them at breakneck speed from poaching, farming and habitat loss. As they disappear, so do all the fauna and creatures that live with them in jungles and forests - priceless treasures we need to nurture for future generations.

The World Parrot Trust works worldwide - and is very careful with its limited resources. I've been a proud contributor for some time and have personally visited some of their operations in the field. They employ local expertise - working with residents and their government to protect parrots and nature.

Many of their efforts have produced significant results - and laws have been changed protecting wildlife. There are many worthy conservation charities worthy of donor dollars. I believe WPT is superior - nearly every penny goes to save parrots vs overhead and because it's small compared to some others - they can move and adapt rapidly to save endangered species. There is good reason this organization has a superb thirty-year track record, and it deserves your support.
